

Grove.

The march of progress and a young man's desire for a modern home for his promised bride have decreed the demolition of the old house on the Hubbard farm, near Grove, and it is being torn down. For more than a century this house has stood conspicuous among those of the country round for its commanding elevation on a pretty knoll rising in that generally flat country, and also for its quaint style of architecture. It was built by the Dickinsons, who a century ago owned hundreds of the surrounding acres. The foundation walls that support the massive timbers of the frame are over two feet thick, the rooms are spacious and high pitched, and the beautifully carved woodwork and mantels would be a treasure to the antiquarian.
